In this vast workshop, where a new order of society is being fashioned, his work has been and still is misunderstood and undervalued. Its detachment from work-a-day interests, from ethical agitations, from social and political movements, from the toils and trials of the hour, from the spirit of restless energy, have seemed to many Americans to show an entire lack of seriousness, and without seriousness there is no real art; they have failed to see that Poe was deeply and genuinely serious in his love of beauty, his passion for perfection of form. In his vision of the place of beauty in the rounded life of the soul, in the harmonious social expression of humanity, he was far in advance of the civilization in which he lived, and he is still far in advance of any general...
